Windsor Hotel Suicide May Result in a Strict Investigation.

The body of Martin E. It lay this morning in a casket in the undertaking establishment of Graham & Sloan, 200 East Twenty-eighth street. The latter have no idea when it will be forwarded. They are awaiting the appearance of E. N. Bleu, a relative of the suicide. Mr. Bleu started for Philadelphia last evening, saying Deputy Coroner Donlin, who rushed up to the hotel, and, after reading a note, left for him by Dr. Bottum, he gave the usual permit for the removal of the body. The rest of the proceedings was in keeping with the policy of secrecy which every one connected with the case wanted to maintain.

When an "Evening World" reporter asked Dr. Bottum this morning way he had not notified the police when first valled in to attend Yates, he said:

"If the man had attempted suicide by ratting his throat, shooting himself, or by lumping out of a window, I should have notified the police, but where poison was taken, as ir this case, it was my business to try to restore life. I don't see what the police had to say to it."

preparations for the wedding. Cohen's business had suffered from the general business depression, and he told his sweetheart that he would like to have as swell a wedding as possible, but he was short of funds and could not hire a hall, as he intended.

However, if Pauline would loan him $200 he would engage a hall and they would invite all their friends, and after a ceremony according to the Hebrew rite they would have a banquet fit for kings. Pauline gave Michael the $200 willingly, she says.

The day set for the wedding feast arrived and all the invited guests were gathered about the doors, while the bride, arrayed in her wedding garments, waited patiently for the bridegroom. But Michael came not at the appointed hour, and when some one found him and took him before the now charinged and disappointed oung woman, he told her he never really intended to wed her, and she went home in tears, while the assmbled guests lisersed.

Miss Greenberg subsequently ascertained that Cohen had found another girl in Brooklyn and had also engaged to marry her, which accounted for his failure to meet his engagement with her.

Thursilay and Friday Allen's brother met those who journeyed up to the West-caster dive and explained that the "jig was up." To each he handed a little card, which contained its own message. It was a plain little business card, reading as follows: "Real Estate and Insurance, 146 Bleecker street, New York, D. Lynch."

These cards were presented to "The" Allen in person at the downtown resort, where he indorsed them with the inscription in lead pencil: "2 South Fifth avenue, Beer saloon."
